Even though she was a Javanese, Kartini, as she is known, embraced Indonesian language. When Kartini met her then French boyfriend, Putt Peteker, they understood each other very well in French as they had studied before. This was one of the greatest sources of conflict between her and her parents because they favored her staying in French school while Putt wanted her to go to Switzerland where he and his family was from. Kartini also did not want to marry Putt because he was rather young and seemed to not be very supportive of the idea of a threesome in a polyamorous relationship with herself and both of them. So, in 1901, Putt decided to return to Switzerland without Kartini. It was at that time, when Kartini left Jakarta and Jakarta city to settle in Surabaya and then Semarang on a plantation, she was in charge of the mission society called Kusnandar in which she was required to take charge of the plantation on which she would later learn how to manage and lead a business. Since Kartini couldn't read Dutch which would have allowed her access to Dutch literature, she learned Dutch from her French teachers and read Dutch literature written by such Dutch writers as Connie Peren, Gerard ter Borch, Sien Reberdo, Bernhard Rivius, Cornelis Dooyeweerd, Romain Rolland and even the Dutch Romantic poet Henrik Ibsen. While Kartini was reading those literatures, she came across the writings of An Nurul Amin. The writings of this Indonesian freedom-fighter who was said to be inspired by the writings of Thomas Paine and Che Guevara, made a huge impact on Kartini and she started to slowly wake up from her passive social existence. The ideal she developed from what she read in An Nurul Amin was independent from social stratification and instead seek autonomy, freedom, and developing of own perspectives. Her parental reaction to this new development was that it was risky and she should stay under their care. Kartini used to argue with her mother and her father about this issue, especially when her family found out about the fact that she had read Dutch literature.
